LAUNCHPAD PREP GUIDE

Writing a great application

How to present your skills and experience clearly in your Amazon apprenticeship application.

What the Amazon application involves

To apply for an Amazon apprenticeship, you find the programme you want, click apply, upload your CV, answer some questions to check you can apply, and complete a short quiz about how you like to work. Applications usually open in October or November each year, and successful apprentices usually start between July and September the next year.

> Tip
> You can sign up to Amazon's Expression of Interest mailing list to get an email when applications open.

Before you start, have these ready

- A list of your experience - from school, part-time jobs, clubs, sport or volunteering.
- Your qualifications and any you are working towards, with grades if you have them.
- Your CV, up to date.
- Contact details for one or two people who can give you a reference, such as a teacher or employer.
- Any ID or documents you might need.

Choose the right programme

Read the programme pages carefully. Each one explains what the role involves and what kind of person does well in it. Apply for the programme that truly interests you, and be ready to explain why. Amazon's apprenticeship team says it wants to see that you have researched the specific programme and are keen to learn.

Writing your CV

Keep your CV to one or two pages. It should include:

- your name, phone number and email address
- a short profile of two or three sentences that says who you are and what you want to do
- your education and qualifications, newest first
- any work experience, including part-time jobs and volunteering
- skills, interests or achievements that are useful for the role

Use a clear layout, a plain font and the same style all the way through. Check your email address looks professional.

Showing your skills

You may not have work experience yet, and that is fine. Think about the skills you already use in other places and could use at work, such as teamwork, communication and solving problems. One Amazon apprentice used her waitressing job to show she could work in a team and manage tasks on her own.

Do not just list skills. Back each one up with a short example of a time you used it.

Weak	Strong
I am a good team player.	In my school's charity week, I worked with four classmates to run a stall, and we raised £150.
I am organised.	I balance a weekend job with my studies by planning my week every Sunday, and I have not missed a deadline this year.
I like technology.	I taught myself to build a simple website using free online lessons, and I use it to share my art.

Answering written questions

If the application asks questions such as "Why do you want this apprenticeship?":

- Answer the question that is asked. Read it twice before you start.
- Be specific about the programme and about Amazon. A general answer that could be sent to any company is weaker.
- Use the STAR method (Situation, Task, Action, Result) for questions about your experience.
- Show what makes you different. Ask yourself, "What can I bring that others might not?"
- Keep to any word limit.

Using AI tools

Amazon says its recruitment team reads every application itself, and that your application should show your own skills, experience and reasons for applying. AI tools can help you check spelling or plan your ideas, but they cannot show your own voice. Write your answers yourself, in your own words.

Before you submit

1. Check your spelling and grammar. Reading your answers out loud helps you spot mistakes.
2. Ask a teacher, careers adviser or family member to read it through.
3. Check every question has been answered and any word limits have been kept to.
4. Make sure you can start on the programme's start date. Amazon says you must be available then.
5. Save a copy of your answers, because you may be asked about them at the interview.

If you need extra support

If you have a disability or a health condition and need changes at any stage, contact Amazon's Applicant Candidate Accommodation Team (ACAT). You can apply to more than one apprenticeship, so it is worth applying to other employers too. If an application is not successful, it is a normal part of the process, and every application helps you improve.
